Selected by the Blackhawks in the third round of the 1980 NHL Draft, Murray spent 12 seasons with Chicago during his 15-year NHL career. A respected two-way forward known for his leadership and consistency, he was a central figure throughout the 1980s and early 1990s and became the first player in franchise history to win the Frank J. Selke Trophy as the NHL's top defensive forward (1985-86).

"Troy was a consummate professional, both through his exceptional play and in the way he represented the Blackhawks long after his playing days," Blackhawks Chairman and CEO Danny Wirtz said. "Known by fans and among his fellow players as an elite, two-way forward, he played the game with toughness and pride, while his contributions off the ice as a Blackhawks broadcaster and ambassador have left a profound and lasting impact on the entire Blackhawks community. Troy's courage, perseverance, and unwavering fight will be remembered and cherished forever."

Following his retirement, Murray continued to shape the organization off the ice through more than two decades as a television and radio analyst, becoming one of the most trusted and recognizable voices in Chicago hockey. His impact extended further through his leadership as President of the Chicago Blackhawks Alumni Association, where he championed former players and strengthened alumni engagement. Under Murray's direction, the Alumni Association also expanded its community initiatives, including youth and high school hockey scholarships, charitable appearances, and support programs for players transitioning to life after hockey.
